The Unreturned Brave. BY MRS. EDSON.

The swallows build beneath the caves,
As in the days agone;
The wheaton fields are all ablase, And in and out the west wind plays Amid the tassled corn

The sunshine falls as warm and bright, The clover fields are red, The wild bird wakes his simple song As joyful the whole day long As if he were not dead !

The thoughtful skies, with mother care, Their rain and sunshine send; And, standing in the farm house door, I see-dotting the landscape o'er-The flocks he used to tend.

The wild-rose and the jassamine blow Beside the window-sill; Their tender moan is in the air.
For the dear hands that placed them there Are lying crossed and still.

The cattle languish for his care, The harvests lack in worth; But oh! the most, because most dear, We miss the words of pleasant cheer Beside our lonely hearth. About the hills the summer folds

Her wealth of golden light; And, past the willow's silvery gleam; I catch the glimmer of the stream, And lillies cool and white.

But oh ! a shadow darkens all The sunshine and the bloom; The voice whose kind and loying words Were sweeter than the songs of birds Is silent in the tomb.

How can the summer fall so gay About the farm-house door! When all the quiet ways he trod-Through leafy wood or bloomy sod-Shall know him nevermore!
